

Who will get my money when I die?

The best way to make sure assets go to the right people is to list them as beneficiaries. By law, the beneficiaries designated for an account or policy will receive the assets in that account or payable under that policy upon your death.

Most people think of life insurance when they think about beneficiaries, however, retirement and investment accounts require an assignment of a beneficiary or a Transfer on Death (TOD) agreement to designate how your assets should be distributed for each account.

A contingent beneficiary is a back-up or secondary beneficiary who receives the assets/money when the primary beneficiary has passed away. If you do not have contingent beneficiaries designated, please make sure you have a valid will in place to provide direction for your estate and to prevent the need for a court to decide who receives your assets. It is important to note that assigning a will as beneficiary is not advised and is often not accepted. If you do not have beneficiaries designated, then in some cases a surviving spouse will become the default beneficiary and in others, the assets will be paid to your estate. When assets are paid to an estate, a will becomes very important in specifying how the money is to be distributed. In the absence of a valid will, usually a court will decide where your assets go.

Minor children generally cannot collect as beneficiaries until they are 18 in most states. If you need to provide for a minor child, you will need to assign a custodian or establish a trust to manage the money until the child turns 18 – and probably should establish a desired guardian for the child. If you fail to do so, then again a court will likely be making decisions, and different parties may end up fighting over what is best for the children in the absence of your guidance.

It is important to review your beneficiaries regularly, particularly when your life circumstances change; such as a marriage, a divorce, the birth or death of a child/grandchild, or the death of a spouse. Beneficiary designations can be much more complex than most people realize because of the many curve balls life may throw us at any given time. It is often difficult for us to think about all the possibilities, but something you should give careful consideration to when making beneficiary designations.

Some of those difficult “curve ball” questions to consider:

- My beneficiary is my spouse, but what happens if my spouse predeceases me and I have no will?
- What happens if I have my husband listed as my beneficiary, and he dies just days after me. Will my children from a prior marriage be excluded from receiving any of my assets?
- I am leaving my assets split equally amongst my three adult children. What if one of my children predeceases me? Will my assets then be divided between only my two remaining children, with my grandchildren from my deceased child being fully excluded from any inheritance?
- My husband and I have “his, hers and ours” children due to prior marriages. How can we ensure all of our children will be taken care of until they are adults if one of us dies?
- I am leaving my assets to my only child, who is in an unstable marriage with children. If I die, will my child’s spouse then receive, through divorce, half of the assets I intended for my child and grandchildren?
- How can I ensure my minor children will be provided for until they are adults in any given situation, upon my death?
- Will my children be mature and responsible enough at age 18 or even at points thereafter to manage a sudden inheritance? Will my lifetime of accumulated assets be spent frivolously in a very short time period?

These are just a few examples of the many challenging questions you may need to be asking when thinking about to whom and how your beneficiaries should be designated. If you need guidance on these types of decisions, or wish to clarify your current beneficiary designations, please feel free to contact our office at 770.931.1414 to ask questions or to schedule a complimentary call or meeting for more in-depth discussion. We also strongly suggest you seek the advice of an estate planning attorney to create a valid will and guide you through the options available to solve for these types of potential situations.
